

Dear FCC:

It is time that Federal Government start worrying about National affairs, International terrorism, and millions of major issues, and get out of the minor issues. XM radio, like satellite TV, is one of those issues that you need to get away from. Individuals should have the right to purchase and listen/watch what they want. The only argument the local channels has is the loss of advertising dollars. This country was founded on competition, and businesses finding a way to offer what the customer wants. Let the local affiliates figure out how to offer what the customer wants, and they will not have a problem. That being said, the FCC has gone way to far to the right on the decency issue. I have always, and will always be a Republican. However, I totally disagree with the FCC telling me what I can see or hear. The last time I checked all radios and TVs have on/off buttons. If people don't like what they are broadcasting, then turn the station off. If enough people do this, the station will go under. This is the American way, not the government deciding what is good or bad. The last I checked, that was the way of Communism. Spend our money on more worthy issues!!!!

Thanks,
David S. Clark
